

PSG-Fans zeigen riesiges Free Palestine -Banner: Minister empört!

PSG-Fans entrollten ein „Free Palestine“-Banner während eines Champions-League-Spiels, was den französischen Minister kritisierte.

Parc des Princes, 75016 Paris, Frankreich - In a dramatic display of solidarity, Paris Saint-Germain (PSG) fans unveiled a massive „Free Palestine“ banner during a UEFA Champions League match against Atletico Madrid at the Parc des Princes. The bold tifo, which spanned both tiers behind the goal, featured the Palestinian and Lebanese flags alongside an image of the Al-Aqsa Mosque, igniting a firestorm of controversy. French Interior Minister Bruno Retailleau condemned the act as “unacceptable” and vowed to seek explanations from the club, emphasizing the potential ramifications of such political statements in a sporting context.

The timing of this provocative display is particularly charged, occurring just days before France is set to host Israel in a UEFA Nations League match. Retailleau’s comments reflect a growing concern over the intersection of sports and political expression, especially in a nation grappling with complex social dynamics. The fans also unfurled another poignant message during the match: “Does a child’s life in Gaza mean less than another?” This sentiment resonates deeply amid the ongoing conflict, with staggering casualties reported in Gaza and Lebanon since the outbreak of hostilities on October 7, 2023.

PSG’s Response and Historical Context

In a statement following the match, PSG distanced itself from the political message, asserting they were unaware of any plans to display such a banner. The club reiterated that the Parc des Princes should remain a space for soccer enthusiasts, free from political agendas. This incident echoes a similar controversy last year when Celtic fans faced fines for waving Palestinian flags during a Champions League game, showcasing the ongoing tension between sports and political activism. As the world watches, the upcoming match between France and Israel looms large, raising questions about security and the potential for further protests in a country home to significant Jewish and Muslim populations.

Details

Ort	Parc des Princes, 75016 Paris, Frankreich
------------	---

Besuchen Sie uns auf: die-nachrichten.at